

Extra Legroom Needed...

We are all ready to get back to flying around the world, but some of us are a little more eager than others. This is most true of a new soul brought into the world halfway through an 11-hour United Airlines flight from Accra, Ghana to Washington, D.C. Fortunately for the mother, the child, the flight attendants and, well, pretty much everyone on the flight, there was a physician and a nurse onboard to assist in this unique delivery. With great attitudes from the staff and mother, the birth took place after about 2.5 hours with the help of some extra space provided by the emergency exits. Everyone was cleaned up and in their seats by the time the flight landed. Tiani Warren, a passenger on the flight, tried to find the words to explain what she had just experienced: "I literally just witnessed a woman giving birth on the plane. And...I am stressed out, I'm excited. I'm tired. All in one. But the baby is a boy. It's beautiful. It was a little sketchy at first, but God is good. This is unreal. I'm in shock right now. This is crazy." KAI
